THE TROLLEY IN PARISP

Strenuous Opposition to the Scheme by Many Citizens. From the Brooklyn Eagle. It looks as if the trolleys were about to invade Paris. The omnibus and tramway companies are on the eve of bankruptey: the former lost $862,176 this year, and six out of ten tramway companies have had no dividends, and the others such small ones that the stockholders are more than disgusted. All this is owing to the popularity of the Metropolitan, which is taking all their business, and when the new lines are completed the surface lines will not make a cent. There is, however, a good percentage of Parisians who prefer to travel above ground, and the old companies are seriously considering the introduction of trolleys as the only way that they can compete with the "meter," as the underground is popularly called. They will have difficulty, however, in getting the franchise from the members of the municipal council. flock to the city and spend their money mar the appearance of the city. Such men as Detaille told a reporter to put down his adjectives as strong as he cared to that it eternal cobweb hanging over its head; that such a mode of transit was simply barbarous. There are people of an entire street in Paris who have no address. Did that ever happen in any other capital? The street where these people live simply has no name. The street and houses were built on the grounds of old gas works almost in the heart of the city, and it is in vain that the dwellers for the last three months have gone on their knees beseeching the members of the municipal council to give their street a name. But the inhabitants of the street want to have it called Rue du General Jeanningros, after a friend of Decoulede and Deroulede is not in good odo with the government.

THE DAISY.

Analysis of the Yellow Disk and the White Rays. From London Knowledge.

The yellow buttonlike disk is composed of a myriad of small perfect flowers, with vellow five cleft tubular corolla, and ring of fused stamens surrounding the pistil. Of calyx we find hardly a trace; the close packing of the flowers leaves no room for it, and renders it unnecessary as a protective structure. In the compositae the caiyx is usually reduced to a few hairs, which often play a valuable part in aiding seed dispersal, as we shall see, by growing as the fruit ripens into a feathery plume or pappus, which acts as a parachute. The marginal or ray flowers of our daisy have no stamens—are female, and their corolla is white, and greatly expanded in an out-ward direction—the only direction in which there is room for expansion.

These ray flowers, in fact, are largely useful in advertising the otherwise incon-spicuous flower head. Similar devices we have already noted in the wild Guelder rose, and we may compare with these such flower heads as those of the little cornel which the flowers are surrounded by a ring of colored leaves, which serve the same purpose. Finally, our daisy head is surrounded by a close fitting double ring of small leaves, the involucre, which incloses the whole in bud, and plays the part that a calyx usually plays in a sin-members of the daisy group that the composite inflorescence attains its greatest beauty and perfection. Examine such a flower form as the ox eye daisy. First we have the close lapping scales of the involucre, securely inclosing the whole, and protectsecurely inclosing the whole, and protect-ing it when in bud. Then the splendid ring of ray flowers, whose object is to render the inflorescence more conspicuous. Thus we find these enormously expanded corollas often assuming a tint other than that of the main mass of flowers—white when the disk is yellow, as in the ox eye; in other species blue or purple or yellow, accompanying a yellow or grayish disk.

These ray florets have sacrificed their perfection as flowers for the purposes of advertisement, and are usually devoid of stamens, or sometimes devoid of both stamens and pistil. Finally, we have the dense mass of disk florets, all perfect, producing a quantity of minute fruits. As for the fruit of the corymbiferae, a large number rely on wind carriage, and the calyx segments take the form of hairs, which grow into a more or less perfect parachute to aid in transporting the comparatively large fruit to pastures new.
